

Dr Sachi Hatakenaka

Independent Consultant and Researcher

UK

Dr Sachi Hatakenaka is an independent consultant and researcher specializing in organizational and policy strategies in higher education. For the past two decades, her work has focussed on how best to develop higher education institutions that are relevant to economic and social development - both in OECD and developing countries.

Previously, she worked at the World Bank focussing on higher education but also working on a wide range of education development issues from pre-primary education, vocational education to S&T policies. Today, she continues her advisory work for governments, international organizations and universities worldwide. She brings a unique comparative and international perspective to higher education, having worked on over 20 different national systems of higher education, and having worked as an employer recruiting globally, and having had ground-level experience both as a student and a researcher in three different countries - in Oxford University, the University of Tokyo and Massachusetts Institute of Technology.
